Course Description

Thinking Like An MBA: Time, Money, Resources and Change Management in the Library

Course Description (from the MLA website): “As not-for-profit institutions adopt more business practices and processes, librarians need to be more knowledgeable about adapting to current strategies. The three basic components of Project Management - time, money and resources (people), will be examined. These in turn can be used on a larger level to demonstrate value, analyze and evaluate personnel and expenditures, and focus on assets to effect Change Management within the organization. As an ideal, this class will assist librarians in serving as models for change within a larger organizational structure while reinforcing their own technical capabilities, customer service and solid teaching techniques in the library. By employing these practices in their own libraries and suggesting them for use in the larger organization, librarians can feel more empowered to suggest and effect change in libraries as well as in their larger work cultures. It is expected that attendees of this session be able to employ demonstrated tools within their own environment upon completion of class.”
