Course Description

Google is widely recognized as the best search engine on the Web and is heavily used to locate health and medical information. This course will teach you how Google thinks and works to optimize your ability to construct effective searches. You will learn to identify and work with Google’s many unique features.

This hands-on workshop will provide exercises, theoretical background, and discussion to give you experience with effectively using Google’s often mysterious defaults, its unique ranking algorithm, its many advanced search options and tools, its potential as an encyclopedic dictionary, its preference settings, and some of its special services. Examples and content are focused for researchers in the fields of medical and health information.

This course is approved for 4 continuing education credits from the Medical Library Association.
